Century Inn

stands on historic ground in the midst of the most fertile land in this part of the county, known as Governor Endicott's Plain.

Governor Endicott was here in 1626 and at that time on his river farm planted his famous pear tree which still lives and bears fruit.

All this part of the country was then Salem. Later it became Danvers and South Danvers (Peabody).

The original house, the nucleus of the present Century Inn, formerly stood on the property of the King Hooper Mansion, later known as The Collins House, "The Lindens", visible across the fields from the Inn.

It was in The Collins House that General Gage, Royal Governor of The Massachusetts Bay Colony, took up his residence, and a group in opposition to the Governor and his tory supporters fired a cannon ball through the front door in defiance of the existing state of affairs. This was before the outbreak of the Revolution.

During some improvements made at the "The Lindens", this little house, very much like a But and Ben type of the Scotch highland country, was moved across the fields to its present location, and served as a home for different families. Some twenty five years ago when it became vacant, Miss Marie Chaltain and Mrs. Annie Rowell in their tours about the country as booking agents for famous concert stars, some of whom were Paderewski, Schumann-Heink, Martinelli, Farrar, Louise Homer and many others, visualized it as a good location for a country eating place. They repaired it and began the business of serving excellent food to patrons who were driving about the country seeking just such a place.

By their industry and foresight the business grew, and has expanded from two rooms and a kitchen, to its present size. It now is one of the best liked eating places in New England.

The location is delightful. In front you look across to Mt. Pleasant (Hog Hill) where some of the oldest houses in the colony, dating back to the 1600's, still stand; and at the back across the lush growing crops of summertime, you see the site of "The Lindens", which was recently dismantled and removed to Washington, D. C., where it has been restored.

The Century Inn is easy of access, being located on the Andover Turnpike in Peabody, also known as Route 114.
